

Everyone is applying to work in Spring/summer.

Seeking employment during the spring and summer months can feel daunting due to the increased number of individuals also applying for jobs during this time. The surge in applicants can create a sense of heightened competition and make the job search process more challenging. It's natural to worry about the impact of this increased competition on your own chances of finding work.

However, I believe that despite the larger pool of applicants, there are still opportunities available during this season. Many industries experience seasonal fluctuations in hiring, and businesses often have diverse needs that require a continuous workforce. While the competition may be steeper, it doesn't mean that all positions are already filled or that I won't find a suitable job.

Networking can also play a vital role during this time. So I tried reaching out to contacts in my industry, attend career fairs, and leverage online platforms to expand my professional network. By making connections and actively seeking out opportunities, I might tap into the hidden job market and increase your chances of finding employment.
